Agrarian Change of Fruit Gardening in an Ageing Community in Rural Northern Thailand

Proposal Type: Individual Paper

Affiliation: The Integrative Center for Humanities Innovation (ICHI), Faculty of Humanities, Thailand

Position: Lecturer

Current location: Chiang Mai, Thailand

Abstract

Thailand is one of the most rapid ageing countries in Southeast Asia. This paper studies societal-agrarian change in a Chiang Mai's ageing rural community, focusing on the veteran fruit orchard owners, who are mostly in the age of seventies. They inherited their fruit gardens from their parents' generation, who acquired the land from the government in the 1960s and 1970s under various pattana (development) initiatives. Despite technological improvement and adoption, these small-scale fruit gardening demands intensive skilled labor input, such as longan tree grafting. Due to the ageing of garden owners, it is overwhelming for them to cultivate fruits and maintain their gardens themselves given such intense manual-labor works. Yet, most of their child and grandchild generations refuse to success their works and become a fruit gardener since many of the younger generations have had their own careers and professions. How do the fruit orchard owners address the questions of successions? How do they deal with labor demand in cultivating and maintaining their fruits orchards? How do they perceive the very tempting alternative financial opportunities that their fruit orchard can yield? This paper unveils the agrarian and social cultural changes of this ageing rural community, unpacking the nuisances under the agrarian changes. It provides an original empirical contribution to the transforming agricultural political economy of Thailand and other Asian countries undergoing ageing rural population.
